NUGGETS of Wisdom

from the Diabetes Community

A DiabetesMine eBook

Edited by Amy Tenderich and Allison Blass

Introduction

uring the 2008 holiday season, Amy Tenderich, founder and author of the blog DiabetesMine, launched an interactive contest where community members submitted their best advice for handling an assortment of holiday related challenges, like holiday parties, exercising during the winter, and travel. Rather than lose all the wonderful words of wisdom accumulated over the course of the 5 week contest, Amy Tenderich and the other judges, Allison Blass and Scott Johnson, thought it would be beneficial for the community if some of the advice was collected into an ebook that could be used as a reference guide over the whole year.

This ebook is a collection of experiences written by people with diabetes in the hopes of making the lives of others a little bit easier throughout the year, rather than specifically during the holidays. The advice is written from first-hand experience and hopefully the five chapters will provide insight and inspiration.

While we wish we could use the hundreds of submissions sent to us, this ebook would be more like a textbook! We would like to thank all of the participants who sent in their submissions during the contest. To see all the submissions, please visit DiabetesMine.com/ebooksubmissions for a full list of links to each contest question. Our community is filled with experienced and extraordinary people with diabetes and their thoughtful contributions should be acknowledged.

Have a happy and healthy 2009!

Sincerely,

Amy Tenderich, Allison Blass, and Scott Johnson

Editor in Chief

Amy Tenderich

Managing Editor

Allison Blass

Design and Production

Gina Capone

Assistants

Scott Johnson Erica Schoonmaker

Photo Credits

Angela - 10, 14

Courtney Benefiel - 10

Alison Finney - 8, 10

Amylia Grace - 6, 14

Scott Johnson - 8

Sara - 6, 12

Beth Sobel - 12, 14

STRESS Nuggets

STRESS Nuggets

Stress • Exercise • Travel • Diabetes Police • Food

Fresh flowers are a fun way to bring a little color into your world.

Music is a great way to get away from it all.

Creativity can bring out the carefree attitude of childhood.

Simple: Enjoy the simple pleasures of — Krestita life. My family!

I put everything on a calendar, including the last minute gift shopping and a few trips to the gym. My diabetes control goes out the window when I have to eat whatever is handy, and I stress about having too much to do. Advance planning allows for a better diet, more exercise, and much less stress. — Meg

I have stopped feeling obligated to attend everything I am invited to. I choose carefully what events I will attend. Also, I take the opportunity to destress with exercise. I read for 20 minutes before bed to relax my overactive mind. This allows me to sleep much better. I do much better with stress when I am well-rested. —Joan

I have discovered that one way to reduce stress is to get some type of MP3 player (like an iPod) and put on things that you like. I put on my iPod podcasts [and] my favorite msuiuc and wear this when I am working outside and am physically active.

All year round, but especially during the holidays, I make sure and see my acupuncturist, who is of great assistance in helping me to balance my whole body and my mind. It calms me down and forces me to slow down for at least an hour during the madcap everything else. Also, I pay more attention to doing very regular TaiChi- meditation in movement - and finally making sure to get more cardio advanced exercise. - Sara Myers

I try to remember to take small breaks throughout the day to just sit still, clear my mind and relax my body. Just a few minutes at a time really makes a difference to keep tensions from building. — Cleo

When worse comes to worse, there's always the advice that I think all moms used to give their kids: Take a very deep breath and count to 10. SLOWLY. Remember to give yourself that time before you say something you might regret later! — AngelaC

The trick is telling between those [who] are just edgy and those who are determined to get a reaction out of you. I just vow to myself that I'm not going to stress just because someone else is. — Scott Strange

I'm all about staying creative.

Personally, I gravitate toward art and crafty endeavors - making cards (be creative and take care of a holiday task), drawing, painting, computer graphics, knitting. Beyond that, there's cooking, gardening, exercising. IF you can lose yourself in an activity like that, you could emerge feeling mentally renewed. Better yet, get a buddy to join you or collaborate with your kid. Help each other, have some good conversation (working alongside your child is marvelously conducive to quality discussion time), and possibly get a few laughs, and you'll find yourself in a much improved state of mind when — Lee Ann Thill you're done.

My suggestion is to volunteer: at a homeless shelter, an assisted living facility, a soup kitchen, etc. No matter what I am stressed about, helping out the less fortunate certainly puts my problems in better perspective.

EXERCISE Nuggets

Stress • Exercise • Travel • Diabetes Police • Food

Jill's daughter Kacey won't let diabetes stop her. She's back on the field a week after diagnosis.

Who says exercise has to be boring? Try something new and exciting to spice up your workout routine!

Scott Johnson keeps active with his basketball team.

If you are trying to do things alone it's very easy to put something off or just not do it. If you plan something with other people, be it swimming, a gym class, mall walking, sports team, whatever, it's a lot harder to not do it. Firstly you have to let the other person or people know you are not going to be participating as planned which in itself can be an issue both in terms of letting somebody else down or just getting in contact with them. Then, since you are canceling the other people involved will most likely try to re-schedule. - KDRoberts

I make it a goal to move and stay active daily. i keep a pedometer on me all the time and have a daily goal of 10,000 steps. I find this little meter really helps me get going. I find that by doing the small stuff like parking the car further away, walking the shopping cart back to the store, taking the stairs, walking around the house while talking on the phone really makes these steps add up. Some days I just do not make it, but having the meter on me, during the day, I can look down and see how much more I need to do to get to my goal. - David

Take an exercise class. Sign up for a spinning, swimming or other class at your gym, or take a local boot camp class if you have that available. Making a financial commitment can help motivate;

just don't make your gym your largest charity donation.

This sounds a little crazy, but during cold weather (especially around the holidays) my friends and I do walking laps around the mall. Just dodging the people makes for a workout, plus we have a large track to go around. People watching, and the cool items in the store windows keep us completely entertained for at least an hour, and every day is different.

Turn the radio on! What's your favorite music? Find it. Turn it up and move around. If its just me, I find some fun music and I just dance around the place. If someone else is there, I entertain them by dancing around. You will break a sweat by moving... and have lots of fun. --- Andrea

I work in the Corporate offices, and with three seven story buildings, each the length of football fields I have plenty of room to go roaming. I make an effort not to call or email anyone when I can walk to their cube, especially if going to their cube means I can take the stairs. I also take a 20-minute stretch break in the afternoon. I get up and just roam the halls, especially the ones that go by the gorgeous windows. It helps me to have a goal that I'm trying to reach, and in the winter a pedometer to push toward 10,000 steps a day is always good. It keeps me reminded that I need to make the effort. — Emmy

To keep myself motivated during the entire year I always focus on the positive benefits that exercising will have, including a longer, healthier life and the stabilizing effect it has on my blood sugar. During the holidays, when it gets hectic, I use the gym time as a break time (a stress free hour). Plus, another motivator is that my regular workout routine helps to eliminate any guilt when indulging in a few holiday treats! --- Randee

I have a very active dog. Caring for her means that either my partner or I (or, on weekends, both of us) have to take her out for at least 20 minutes 3 times a day. When we have time, her walks can be longer and involve ballthrowing and lots of running around. — Megan

TRAVEL Nuggets

TRAVEL Nuggets

Stress • Exercise • Travel • Diabetes Police • Food

The Great Wall of China is no match for a well-prepared person with diabetes.

Always wear medical alert jewelry. I am single and travel alone a majority of the time. You never know when something might happen that you would need that jewelry to speak for you.

We travel with diabetic kids. Two. One was diagnosed on the first day of a trip to Disney World. Disney is fun. A diabetes diagnosis isn't. So here is my advice for traveling to Disney World with diabetic kids: Double Packing. Redundant is the magic word for diabetics packing for Disney: Redundant Meter, double the needles, zillions of sharps, twice the strips, two times the needed bottles of insulin, call your pump manufacturer and get a loaner pump for vacation, take double the sets, double the IV prep and twice the needed number of pump reservoirs, and two carry-on bags each with half the stuff in each bag. We have lost a meter, set down and walked away from carry-on bags and diagnosed a second kid as diabetic all on trips to Disney. I can say from experience it is nice to have extra stuff. Pack doubles. — Bennett

Travel far, travel hard. Always take a doctors letter about your diabetes. Get duplicate prescriptions of your supplies and medication. Take the telephone numbers for your healthcare providers, pump company, — SLeal insurance company.

Always, always be prepared with double the supplies you think you'll need!

Compile on your computer (and keep updated!) a list of the supplies you need to take with you. If possible, have two sets of eyes go over the packing; it's amazing the errors — Debi Martin we've found this way.

My best advice for air travel though is - don't tell them you are diabetic. Seriously! In the beginning, I used to tell them I was diabetic and wearing a pump, and while I did not set off the metal detectors I still had to sit through a private screening which slowed my whole group down. Now I adopt a 'don't ask - don't tell' policy, and have not been stopped once. I have syringes, insulin, test strips, and pump supplies in my bags and they have never been inspected. Sure, I carry a note from the doctor allowing me to carry it, but it has been folded up into the back of my wallet for years having never seen the light of day. — Sara

Pack all your essentials in your carry on bags. Do not put something that is essential in your bags you do not take on the plane with you. I pack so that if any luggage is lost, I have what is needed with me. I also pack my carry on baggage so, if there is no longer any room on the plane, and they need to take the carry-on away, that I can remove my essentials and continue to carry them on the plane in a smaller bag that I put under the seat. — David

Angela checks out Zugspitze, the highest mountain in Germany.

When planning a trip where you'll be staying with many different people as a house guest (like my last trip to the States, where I was hosted by friends and family and employers over a three-week period) always make sure you have an ample supply of Clif Bars (or your favorite portable meal-replacer) just in case the breakfast options aren't what you need them to be. This was more important for me when I was on MDI, but it's proven to be immensely helpful even now that I'm on the pump. - Megan

Keep a close eye on your diabetes, but remember to have fun too.

Differences in activities and foods are common when you travel, so things may be a little off. Test often and treat - but don't be too hard on yourself if things are a little out of whack. Just do your best. — Karen

DIABETES POLICE Nuggets

DIABETES POLICE Nuggets

Stress • Exercise • Travel • Diabetes Police • Food

With modern technology like glucose meters and insulin pumps, a person with diabetes can tackle any challenge.

I usually tell them that diabetes is unique in the way it manifests itself in each person and what each diabetic can eat and the amount is different in each of us. We are all different, just like snowflakes.

—Debbie

'Thank you for your concern.'
Smile. Change the subject. Repeat.
In my experience, the diabetes police aren't usually loved ones (at least not after the first few years).

— Mollyjade

To strangers or people who know me less well who tell me that I shouldn't eat something, or warn me about the sugar content, I simply tell them that I'm on the pump (here I might take it out and show them) and that means that as long as I know how many grams of carbohydrate are in something and bolus appropriately for it, I can eat more or less whatever I want. This works on everyone except my Type 2 grandfather, who, 13 years into this, still hasn't registered that my diabetes and his are different animals.

- Megan

Carbohydrate counting books can help show non-diabetics that we can eat treats.

I usually start with a detailed explanation of what carb counting is and how to do it. They are usually surprised that I can name the amount of carbs of almost anything on the table. Then I tell them the carb count of what they are about to eat. Usually they are too amazed that I actually weigh and measure my food most of the time to continue diabetes police-ing! — Kristen

I like to explain my diabetes to anyone as I am a stick shift and you run automatic. Where your body adjusts in reaction to everything you do/eat, I need to Scales and measuring cups can help a non-diabetic provide you with necessary information - make them part of your team!

'shift my gears' to keep going.

— Sarah

I find that if I am a little proactive at the beginning of a meal, it goes a long way to silence the diabetes police. I generally have an idea of who might say something to me. So, just before the meal I go up to them and ask if there is anything they know about that I should avoid. Generally there is one or two desert items so high in sugar, in their mind it may kill a diabetic (as one person told me last night) I ask them to point this out to me. Most often, it is something I would probably avoid anyway.

—David

I stay patient. I know people are not all educated in certain things so i try to not get mad and make the most of it.

—Tarra

Don't worry, I brought extra insulin. Just for this. This is pretty hard to say with a straight face, as I have an insulin pump.

— Patrick

FOOD Nuggets

FOOD Nuggets

Stress • Exercise • Travel • Diabetes Police • Food

Amylia doesn't let her diabetes get in the way of a good time in Taiwan.

Beth says Diabetics CAN eat sugar!

Angela celebrates her birthday with a cake made from Splenda.

I try to enjoy small amounts of my favorite things, test often and bolus on the pump as necessary. — Kathy Calorie King is your best friend. Make sure to carry around your favorite dietary fact book (I use Calorie King: Calorie, Fat and Carbohydrate counter.) It's an invaluable resource and really helps when in a pinch.

My strategy for managing blood sugar levels at parties is quite simple. I try to consume very little more than I ordinarily do and concentrate on enjoying the company of friends and relatives. That way I am not stressed out, nor does my eating or drinking cause anyone else to take notice. Since I never consume alcohol at any other time, not doing so at a party doesn't raise an eyebrow. Simple but effective. — John

As a pumper, I have the option of using a dual or square wave bolus while at parties or large meals. When figuring my bolus I take not only the carbs into consideration but the fat as well. Holiday meals and party food is often very rich and loaded with both carbs and fat, and that fat can really change the action of the carbs. By using a dual wave bolus and testing frequently I can usually manage but I still have to watch for rising blood sugar overnight since the fat can really hit me then. — Liz portion size, etc. This makes it easier for me to determine carbohydrates of the food. I do look at my Calorie King book to help me estimate the carbs. — Tarra

I concentrate on eating the stuff that only minimally raises my blood glucose level, i.e., protein and fat. (It's also the satiating stuff!) That means I eat cheese and meat and non-starchy veggies (i.e., cauliflower and broccoli). It means I don't eat the bread around sandwiches, or the tortillas around wraps. If I eat anything floury, then it has to be excellent, such as homemade shortbreads (and then only one — if I can)

I try to test often, stick to water or diet beverages, eat the low to no carb items, and generally enjoy myself. Parties are a time for happiness and fun. In my opinion, its ok to let loose once in a while and relax on the control for a night as long as I stay vigilant the rest of the time. — Jason

My most important strategy [is to] enjoy the moment of celebrating with my friends and family and make the focus on them - not the food. Life gets so hectic and our time together is short - I want savor every moment I have with them! — Kelly K

I make sure that when I arrive I'm not starving, because if I am there is no keeping me from eating 14 deviled eggs. (slightly kidding here) I keep a can of natural almonds in my car and I munch on a handful before I go into restaurants or parties to keep me feeling full. Another thing I do, if I know I might want to indulge in a few sweets is get a good cardio work out in before the party. When I exercise it keeps my sugars lower for several hours after the workout and almost seems to act as extra insulin would. - Windy help and inspire you in your life with diabetes. If nothing else, it sure is nice to know how many others are out there living with the same struggles and frustrations. Our aim is to bring the diabetes community together in ways never possible before. For that, we say thank you, Internet, for making this achievable. And thank YOU, our brothers and sisters with diabetes, for sharing your best practices with us all at DiabetesMine.com!

In appreciation,

Amy Tenderich

